der of C. W. Waterman has diverted public attention from the judicial election and opened a new topic for discussion. At the time of the coroner's investigation in January the jury lacked only a mere thread of evidence to fix the responsibility for the murder and to warrant the arrest of the guilty parties. According to the testimony of Detective Richmond, Wall's confidence and confession were gained in this wise: Richmond came here dressed in rages and impersonating a general allround tough, Scraping acquaintance with Wall, they both went on a spree, Richmond buying all the drinks. He soon won Wall's confidence, and by claiming to have committed a murder for money down in Rhode Island and to be anxious to escape justice, he drew from Wall the confession that "he was in the same boat." Cautious questioning persuaded the latter to unfold particulars, when suddenly the "nippers" were produced and Wall was hustled off to 'Spuire Eastman's office, where the indictment was made out and he was committed to jail at once.
